The actors of the Broadway enactment of the Fences scene where Cory confronts his father and asks "why don't you like me?" were much more serious and raw than the comedic enactment by Denzel Washington. The grim lighting and silent audience gave that solemn affect in contrast to the lightheartedness of the other play.

In her book Queer Phenomenology (QP), Sara Ahmed refers to the English-language idiom of 'being treated like furniture' to make the point that furniture is often positioned in the background of human interaction. To be 'like furniture' is to blend into the unnoticed, taken-for-granted objects that, according to a Ahmed's phenomenological approach, in fact scaffold our lives.
